Gershom Scholem, "Redemption through Sin," Two Parts. Scholem's essay is not really a history of Sabbatianism. It is a study of a certain way of thinking. It looks at the history of the movement as revealing important truths about the nature of Messianism in Judaism, and about the condition of Judaism and Jews after seventeen hundred years of exile and persecution.

Gershom Scholem, "Redemption through Sin," Two Parts

In 1666, a man by the name of Sabbatai Zevi declared himself to be the Messiah. Followers of his heretical cult believed that sin is holy and should be practised for its own sake. Sabbateans and their successors, the Frankists, have indulged in religious orgies, ritual sacrifice, incest, adultery and homosexuality for 350 years.

This notion is quite similar to that sometimes cited in the context of Sabbateanism of "redemption via sin." This belief is linked with the Lurianic doctrine of the raising of the holy sparks (ni?o?ot), though Besht limited this concept to the salvation of the individual soul. Hasidim believed that the immanence of God in everything meant that even great evil or pollution had a spark of the divine hidden somewhere within it.

Redemption Through Sin - Prepare For Change

A preliminary study on Sabbatean antinomianism "Redemption through Sin" was published in 1936 and then appeared in English in 1970. During that time, in the late 1930's, Scholem received an invitation from the Jewish Institute of Religion in New York City to deliver a series of lectures on Jewish Mysticism.

In his classic essay "Redemption Through Sin", Scholem argued a different position, seeing Frankism as a later and more radical outgrowth of Sabbateanism. In contrast, Jay Michaelson argues that Frankism was "an original theology that was innovative, if sinister" and was in many respects a departure from the earlier formulations of Sabbateanism.
