The Rothko Chapel Paintings: Origins, Structure, Meaning ...

The Rothko Chapel is a non-denominational chapel in Houston, Texas, founded by John and Dominique de Menil. We wouldn't be interested in it if it wasn't a major work of modern art – it is quite interesting architecture-wise, as it's an octagon inscribed in a Greek cross, looking a little like an Egyptian tomb from the outside.

Rothko Chapel – In Search For A Meaning – Art History Stories

In 1964, he agreed not just to contribute paintings to the chapel but to collaborate on the architecture that would hold them. In Perspectives of New Music, music historian Steven Johnson writes that Rothko "regarded his Chapel commission as the major event in his career. His paintings were to hang by themselves in a space he had designed, and they would be viewed in a context that would emphasize humanistic meaning over abstraction."

Paintings Rothko had created for New York's Four Seasons Hotel in the late 1950s inspired the de Menils to commission the artist to create the Chapel's powerful murals.

Rothko Chapel

The Menils, who were well-known Catholics, were inspired to establish the chapel after they received advice from a friend known as Rev Marie-Alain Couturier, who believed that modern artists could revive forgotten sacred art. The Rothko Chapel sits next to the campus of the Menil collection 2 and has been open to the public almost every day since it was established.

What is Rothko's Chapel in Houston all about?

For Rothko, the chapel was to be a destination, a place of pilgrimage far from the center of art (in this case, New York) where seekers of Rothko's newly "religious" artwork could journey. Initially, the chapel, now non-denominational, was to be specifically Roman Catholic, and during the first three years of the project (1964–67) Rothko believed it would remain so.
